Introduction

The Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorders (FASD) National Resource Directory was originally conceived as an update to “Charting the Future”, a national resource directory created in 2000 by Barbara Morse, PhD and Corinne Barnwell, MSW.

As work on the current directory began, it quickly became clear that an update would be inadequate. “Charting the Future” listed only resources with specific expertise in FASD. Since 2000, we have learned a great deal about FASD as a lifelong neurodevelopmental disorder, and in response this new Resource Directory lists resources in a much broader, more comprehensive context.

The Directory is intended to be aspirational, in that it lists not only those organizations that currently address FASD, but also includes other groups that have the capacity to address FASD, even if they do not currently do so. This includes Developmental/Behavioral Pediatric clinics, which were fewer in number in 2000. It includes developmental disability groups, as FASD is clearly a developmental disability. It includes parent-to-parent support organizations, as parents and caregivers raising a child with an FASD need contact with and knowledge from other parents and caregivers. It includes special education resources, as those with an FASD will need special education. It includes legal resources, as those with an FASD may be involved with the legal system more often than those with other disabilities.

The Directory will point families affected by FASD and the professionals who work with them to a wide range of resources where they might get help in identifying, treating, and preventing FASD. At the same time, we hope the Directory will be a guide that can begin to broaden the range of professions and community resources interested in becoming knowledgeable about and willing to address the complexities of FASD.

We further hope the Directory will provide an avenue by which to expand public awareness about the challenges faced by those with FASD and the successes they can achieve. The advocates who can foster increased public perception are many, and include affected families, scientists, medical providers, social services providers, and perhaps, most importantly, individuals with FASD themselves.

This Resource Directory is intended to be a living document, that is, we invite people who use it to send us any additional resources they have found valuable, as well as any corrections that should be made. The Directory is freely available online, and with your input we will be able to make periodic updates and continue to make the information more useful.

Please contact Susan Stoner, PhD (sastoner@uw.edu) to suggest additions or corrections.

Me and My FASD

hello@fasd.me

<https://fasd.me/>

Not from Canada, but Britain, and very good. An interactive website created by a British young man with an FASD himself to help others understand and deal with their challenges.

State by State Resources

The following is a list of resources with the capability to address FASD through diagnosis, support and information for families, resources to find substance abuse treatment for women, especially pregnant women, and a wide variety of other legal, educational and research-based sources.

Some of the medical and neuropsychological services listed here have a named FASD clinic. These are in the minority. Other services list FASD or FAS as a condition which they treat, even if the clinic has a broader name. Most of the other diagnostic sites listed are developmental-behavioral pediatrics clinics. These clinics address a wide variety of challenges, including autism, other prenatal drug exposure, ADHD, speech and language disorders, eating disorders, behavioral dysfunction and developmental delays. Those familiar with FASD will recognize that many of the challenges listed. These challenges are all part of FASD. While these clinics may not have the level of experience of a named "FASD" clinic, they clearly do have the capacity; all that is needed is the desire to help families by broadening their understanding of the effects of prenatal alcohol exposure. It is our hope and aspiration that families reaching out to all of these clinics will enlarge the diagnostic capability throughout the US.
